Event Summary

Commercial olive cultivation and olive oil production are recent in Brazil, no more than 20 years old, totaling approximately 12,000 hectares cultivated and distributed across the states of RS (55%), MG (30%), SP (10%), and PR, SC, ES, and RJ (5%). National olive oil production in the 2022–2023 harvest reached only 0.8% of the imported volume, which is around 110,000 tons of olive oil and 125,000 tons of preserved olives, ranking second in the global import market. This represents immense potential for national olive production, which is already emerging with internationally recognized and award-winning extra virgin olive oils.

"However, there are challenges to be overcome in growing olive trees in subtropical conditions, including the diverse soil and climate conditions to which the plant has been adapting, the need to increase productivity, reduce costs and compete with imported oils of inferior quality compared to domestic ones. In the future, uncertainties arise in relation to climate change, the spread of diseases such as progressive branch wilt caused by the bacterium Xylella fastidiosa (Bacterial Leaf Scorch) and the need for new production and marketing strategies, which will be discussed at this symposium by Brazilian and European experts, together with the production chain."
